In my stock market journey, I have met many intraday traders who burned their hands in the market and yet pursued the same notion

The major issue with their psychology is the fact that they want to trade daily. To be honest, "to have regular income from the stock market, one needs to be irregular when taking trades".

Simply put, the market does not give you opportunities daily, there might be days with no opportunity. In order to trade daily, traders usually buy and sell without any logic just to satisfy their urge to place an order in the market. In the end, they blow their capital and curse the market. This is a classic case of intraday traders. On the other hand, when we look at the job professionals, we see them trading during their office hours.

Their major complaint is that they fail to look at the charts while in office and as a result miss trading opportunities.
