

Avoid Doxxing Yourself

Share online without revealing where your real life happens

Social media rewards immediacy. Post the view from your balcony, tag the café, celebrate a new job and upload photographs from a family gathering. Each update may appear harmless, yet together they can reveal your home, workplace, routine, relatives and location. Doxxing does not always begin with a database breach. Sometimes the victim has unknowingly published most of the clues.

The safer approach is deliberate disclosure: decide which identity is speaking, what strangers can infer and whether the information must be shared now.

Separate the public identity

A pseudonymous or creator account should use an original username, profile image, email address and biography. Do not recycle a handle, headshot or distinctive sentence from a personal profile. Avoid combinations that identify you indirectly, such as an exact job title, small employer, neighbourhood, graduation year and unusual hobby.

Keep the account in its own browser profile and avoid signing into personal services there. Do not connect it to the same public contact details unless that link is intentional.
