

Set up Android like a power user

First hour is crucial for a power user

The most important hour in the life of an Android phone is not the hour when you finally discover a clever shortcut, install a brilliant app, or take a stunning low-light photograph. It is the first hour after you switch it on. That is when the phone quietly asks you a series of questions that will decide how clean, safe, useful, annoying, private, backed-up and reliable it will be for the next few years.

Most people rush through this part. Then, three months later, they wonder why the phone is full of promotional notifications, duplicate apps, strange recommendations, half-restored contacts, missing WhatsApp chats, wrong default SIM settings, and a storage warning that appears every second morning like a debt collector.

A power user does the opposite. A power user treats the first boot like setting up a new workspace. You would not move into a new office by throwing every cable, file, charger and snack packet on the table. You would decide where things go, what you need, what can wait, and what should never enter the room. Android deserves the same discipline.

Before you switch on the new phone

Your Android setup should begin before the new phone leaves
