

but his principles of musical education and the development of staff notation had profound influence. With a system of precise notation, musicians could perform more complex music, and even produce original compositions, knowing that these could be accurately reproduced. A written record of the music meant that it was possible to distribute ideas widely and quickly. It is no exaggeration to say that Guido ushered in the age of Western classical composers.