

A GERMAN REQUIEM

Brahms's longest work is perhaps his most poignant. It was inspired in part by his grief at the death of his mother.

Liszt and Schumann

In 1850, Brahms met a young Hungarian violinist, Eduard Reményi, whom he accompanied in several recitals. They made a concert tour of German cities in 1853, and although this was not particularly successful as a business venture, it had a profound impact on Brahms's life. During the tour he met another violinist,
