

lullaby to death.”

Fauré’s style forms a clear bridge between the Romanticism of Chopin and Schumann, and the more modern approach of Impressionist composers such as Debussy. He specialized in song cycles, piano pieces, and chamber music, and many of his compositions are gentle and reflective. However, in his later years when he was going deaf, he was capable of evoking fierier moods, using mild discords and disruptive harmonies.

Fauré’s tremendous originality was finally recognized when he was appointed director of the Paris Conservatoire and honored with a public tribute, which was led by the French president.

CARICATURE OF SAINT-SAËNS

Fauré captured his friend and mentor in this charming cartoon. Saint-Saëns encouraged the young Fauré to compose his own works.
