

with a far younger woman, Kamila Stösslová, whom he met in 1917. Their letters provided him with great inspiration for his work; many of his finest operas and chamber works date from these years, notably Katya Kabanová and the string quartet Intimate Letters. It was only now, too, that his works began to achieve the full recognition that he had craved.

During an excursion to the countryside with Stösslová and her son, Janáček contracted a chill, which became pneumonia. He died of the illness on August 28, 1928.

FOLK DANCES IN MORAVIA

Title page of the score for Janáček's Folk Dances in Moravia. The composer was inspired by Moravian traditions to produce a radically new form of music.
