

BURROWERS

Have you ever seen a creature disappear into a hole? This could be the entrance to a network of tunnels and chambers, called burrows.

Stripy faced badgers eat rabbits.

Rabbit hole

European rabbits graze on plants above ground, at dusk and dawn. If a predator disturbs them, they dive into their tunnel network, which is called a warren.

Coyotes wait hungrily for gophers to pop up.

Gophers push soil up to the surface as they dig, which leaves long mounds on the surface.

Gopher town

American pocket gophers use their claws and huge teeth to dig tunnels. They pop out of holes to eat plants. Their burrows include deep nests and food-storage chambers.
