

Source - Trading View

This is an example of how head and shoulders look in practice. This is an upward head and shoulders pattern. The closing price is finding repeated support at the pointed line. However, when bears break the bullish support, it means bears have a very firm grip on the market and this is a short signal. We can see a clear breakout of the head and shoulder pattern over here. The challenge here for an analyst is to identify these patterns. It takes a lot of practice to identify these patterns in greater detail. The only thing an analyst sees on a chart is the closing price chart.