

2. Legwork

Conducting legwork involves physically gathering data firsthand by visiting places like malls and construction sites. Observing foot traffic, brand popularity, and construction materials provides valuable insights into potential investment opportunities.

For example, thriving brands in local malls may indicate broader success. Speaking to contractors about their preferences can also reveal promising companies. However, thorough evaluation is necessary, as not all ideas may be viable. Additionally, observing travel trends, such as commuting and dining preferences, can offer further insights. By immersing oneself in different environments and paying attention to consumer behavior, one can uncover valuable investment prospects.
