

LIVING RELATIVE

The Tasmanian devil is one of the closest living relatives of the thylacine. This cat-sized carnivore is named for its blood-curdling scream and is famous for having an immensely powerful bite that can crush bones. It eats every bit of a carcass—bone, skin, feet, and all. When alarmed, it gives out a foul odor to drive away enemies.

▲ ROCK PAINTINGS made by the aboriginal people of Australia show that thylacines were once widespread on the Australian mainland.
