

LIVING RELATIVE

Salamanders are related to frogs but have long, slender bodies. They live in damp places and can breathe through their moist skin. Some species lay their eggs in water, the eggs hatching out into tadpoles that breathe through gills. Others species breed entirely on land.

