

Curls and fringes Hair was worn to shoulder length – curled and frizzed with fringes. Wigs were introduced by King Louis XIII, but they did not become popular until the mid-century.

Decorative detail One of the more elaborate accessories were boothose tops – decorative, lace-edged or embroidered tops of overstockings. They were also made as separate tops that tied like large cuffs around the top of the stocking.

Pelt hat The “sugarloaf” hat with a high crown and narrower brim was popular along with the “cocked” hat, which had a shorter crown and wide brim, worn at an angle. The finest hats were made of beaver pelts imported from North America.

Huge rosettes Shoes with open sides were popular and toe shapes became squarer. They fastened with ribbons or decorative rosettes known as shoe roses. The cloak remained essential outdoor wear.

Doublet rises When doublets shortened in the 1640s it became fashionable for the linen shirt to be visible between the hem and the top of the breeches, often with decorative ribbons around the waist. Decorative lace cuffs remained in vogue.