

Fur tippet over shoulders

Hair teased into small curls at forehead

Muff Large fur muffs were a popular, but costly, accessory to winter dress in the 1640s. The muff is worn here with a fur wrap known as a tippet, which is draped shawl-like around the shoulders.

Soft ringlets with extra hair now at sides of head

Ribbons and bows worn in hair

Patterned fabric This long boned bodice and separate skirt are made of matching figured woven silk. While skirts seen beneath gowns could be embroidered or patterned, portraits from the mid-17th century rarely show patterns on bodices and skirts.

Fur muff

Silk sash worn across one shoulder

Ringlets on one shoulder

Softly draping folds

Trailing hem, with fullness concentrated on back

Full sleeves with panes that show billowing smock beneath

Length of draped fabric

Topknot at back of hairstyle

Sloped shoulders

Sleeves of smock or shift beneath

Unadorned fabrics Women's fashions at the court of King Charles I were stylish and elegant. Dresses were made of relatively undecorated fabrics such as woven silk taffetas and satins, in colours such as apricot and soft blues and greens.

Plain-coloured fabric shimmers as wearer moves

Full skirts with trailing hem

Portrait painters English court artists in the 1630s, including van Dyck, painted fabric folds and billows rather than recording stylistic details, which makes it difficult to date precisely. Hairstyles and accessories, however, give an impression of current styles.