OPULENCE RESTORED

With the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, opulence returned to fashion in England. The justaucorps (knee-length coat) took over from the doublet as the main garment in a man's wardrobe. Its body was longer and straighter than the doublet, falling to the knee and fastening down the front with small buttons from neck to hem. The lower part of the coat known as the skirt had back and side openings (to allow a sword to poke through). Gradually it became tighter on the waist and fuller at the hem. Sleeves were wide with turned-back cuffs. The waistcoat was worn underneath – it was the same length but narrower in cut than the coat, with long, fitted sleeves. Breeches were still worn full and short to just below the knee, often decorated with bows and ribbon trimmings. By the 1680s breeches became slimmer in fit and fastened at the knee.

Breeches Petticoat breeches, known as pantaloons at this date, were falling out of style. Canions – the form of under-breeches with elaborate trimmings, which fell below the hem of the petticoat breeches – had been popular in the early part of the century.

Shoulder sash A baldric – a leather or silk sash – was worn to support the sword. With military dress the baldric could be used to denote the allegiance or rank of a soldier before the introduction of uniforms.

Shoe buckles Shoes became popular again, taking over from boots. A new style of fastening – the shoe buckle (a square or rectangular metal fastening) – was both decorative and practical. Charles II brought to England the heels and red soles earlier introduced by Louis XIV at the French court.
