

High, pleated collar

Very high waist

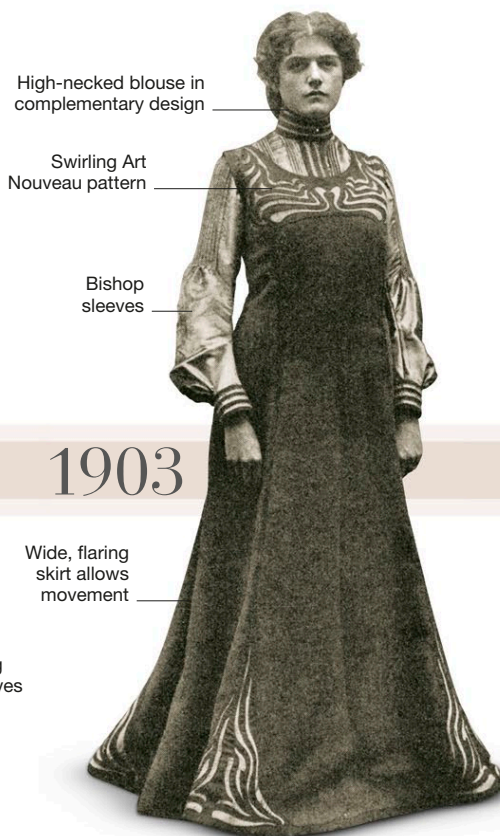

Geometric pattern

Bell shape

Narrow skirt

1913

Pattern Austrian designer Eduard Josef Wimmer-Wisgrill founded the fashion department of Wiener Werkstätte. His design reflects a move towards a tubular form. The use of different patterns and colours strengthens the effect of stacked-up geometric shapes.

High-necked blouse in complementary design

Swirling Art Nouveau pattern

Bishop sleeves

Wide, flaring skirt allows movement

Long sleeves

1903

Artistic reform The Munich artist Elisabeth Winterwerber designed this outfit using Art Nouveau motifs. Its softer lines are a direct contrast with the S-shaped corseted dresses of the period.

Shoulder falls naturally

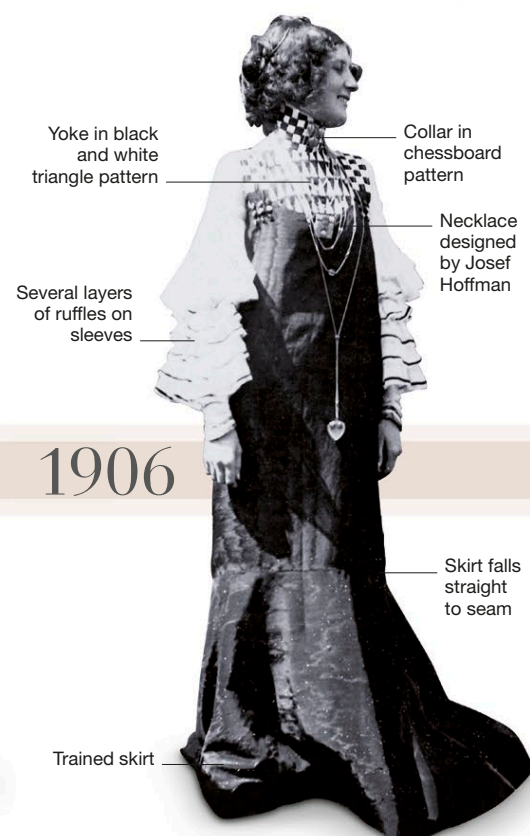

Wide arm holes

Contrasting silk lining

Large peacock feather pattern

1915

Liberty The London department store Liberty & Co. had been associated with aesthetic dress since the 1890s. This dramatic evening gown shaped like a kaftan is made of "hera", one of the most well-known Liberty prints.

Yoke in black and white triangle pattern

Collar in chessboard pattern

Necklace designed by Josef Hoffman

Several layers of ruffles on sleeves

Skirt falls straight to seam

Trained skirt

1906

Austrian revolt Defying the prevailing fashion, Viennese couturier Emilie Flöge wears a loose gown designed by her partner, the Austrian painter Gustav Klimt. A Wiener Werkstätte necklace accessorizes the gown.

Wide scoop neckline with drawstring encased along inside edge

Belt of matching silk with silver metallic stencil of trailing oak leaves and dots

Pleats fall like a Greek column, worn without a corset

Full-length dress sweeps floor

1920

Mariano Fortuny The Spanish designer's trademark dress was the Delphos, a simple column of finely pleated silk, inspired by Greek clothing. Mme Condé Nast, Isadora Duncan, and Lilian Gish were photographed in his gowns.