

1933

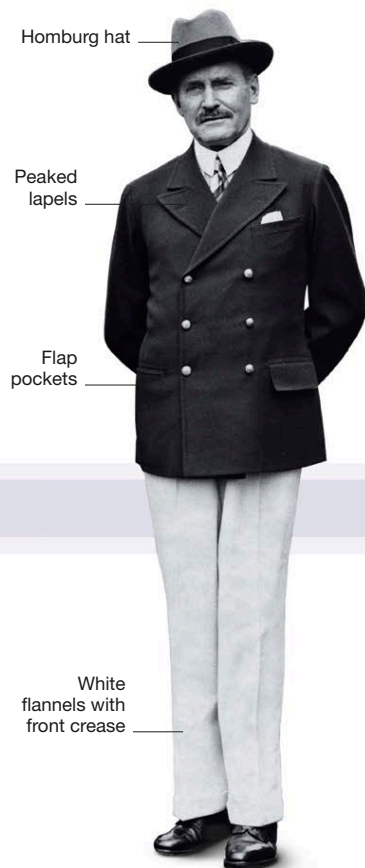

Honeymoon suit Newly wed Lord Furness is dressed for a honeymoon trip in his private aeroplane. He wears a smart double-breasted jacket with peaked lapels; the black carnation buttonhole may be a symbol of mourning.

1935

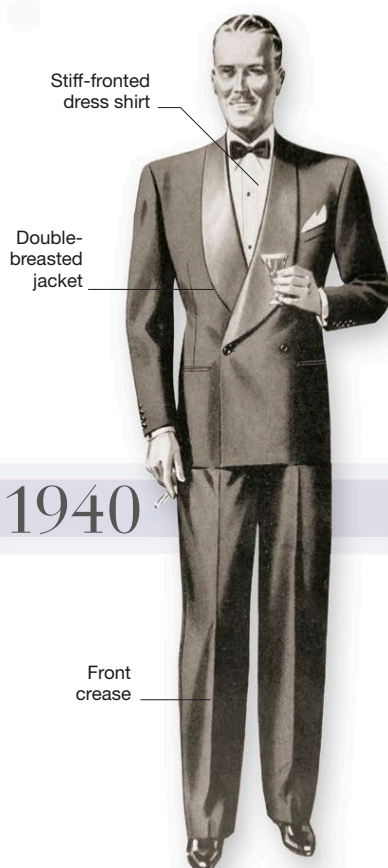

Mess jacket For a short period during the 1930s the tail-less "mess jacket" became an alternative for the white dinner jacket in hot weather. This fashion was borrowed from military "mess dress" (formal eveningwear).

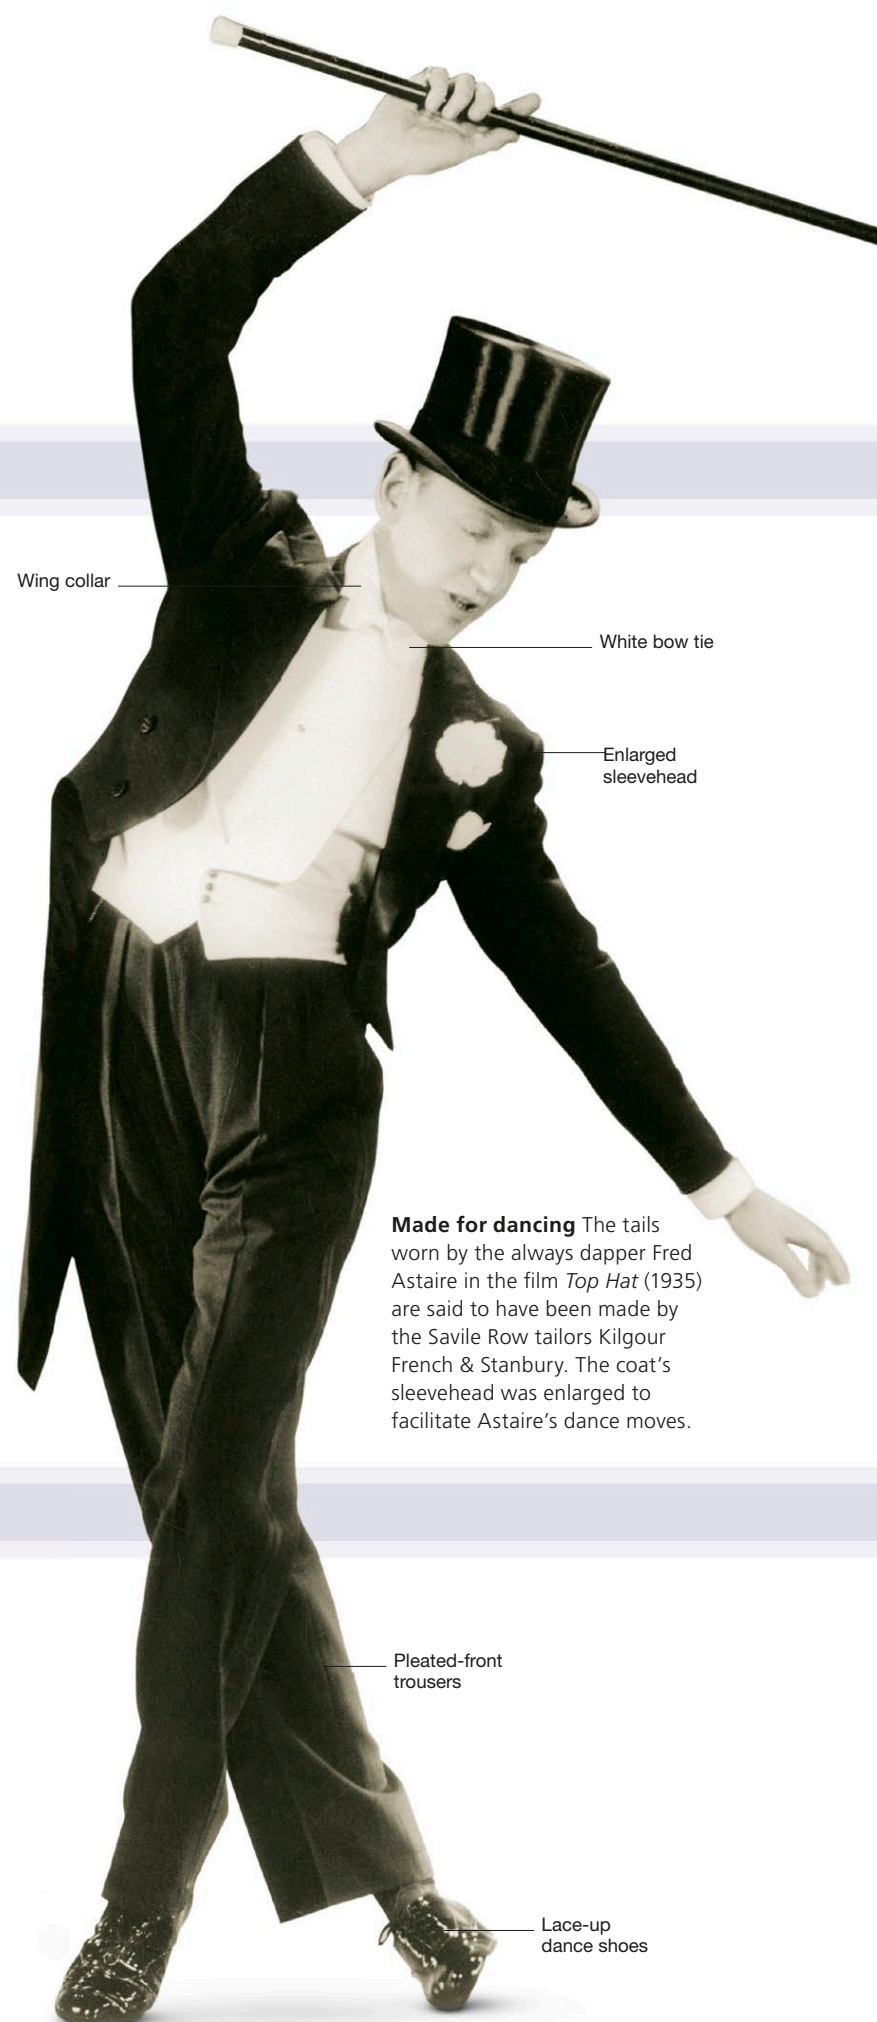

Reefer jacket Prince Arthur of Connaught, Queen Victoria's grandson, shows how to wear this jacket correctly. All three buttons should be fastened when there are no "show" (purely decorative) buttons at the top.

1940

Dinner jacket suit The double-breasted dinner jacket was considered slightly more informal than the single-breasted variety. It usually had shawl lapels that could be faced with gleaming satin instead of silk.

Made for dancing The tails worn by the always dapper Fred Astaire in the film Top Hat (1935) are said to have been made by the Savile Row tailors Kilgour French & Stanbury. The coat's sleevehead was enlarged to facilitate Astaire's dance moves.
