

In town English tailors traditionally called a single-breasted jacket a lounge coat and a double-breasted jacket a reefer coat. This example was described as a “two-button (show three) D.B. Reefer Suit”, appropriate for town wear.

Muted elegance The always dapper Eduard Beneš, President of Czechoslovakia in exile, arrived at his London offices wearing a long-coated, three-piece lounge suit underneath a trench coat.

Sultan of swoon Frank Sinatra is photographed without a tie in a soft sports shirt, wide-cuffed peg trousers, and co-respondent shoes. For suits, he favoured big knots when wearing four-in-hand ties.

Wide boy The clothes and the attitude of this young Londoner nonchalantly smoking display several “wide-boy” characteristics: a double-breasted suit, a hat worn at a rakish angle, and a wide tie.

Demob suit When a British soldier had completed his wartime service he had to report to a demobilization centre to be processed for civilian life. His kit was exchanged for a three-piece, single-breasted or two-piece, double-breasted suit.

Ulster “Demob” boxes contained a coat usually of the raincoat variety. This belted Ulster, a sporty take on a traditional style, was popular in the 1940s. Double-breasted versions required more fabric than utility coats.